The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Japan's document on Japan's policy towards the Russian Federation outlines objectives such as resolving the Northern Territories issue, normalizing relations, and providing assistance for Russia's reforms. The document also mentions political dialogues, security and defense agreements, and Japan's contributions to enhancing safety in the Russian nuclear power industry.

Elaboration

The evidence indicates that China and Russia are increasing military cooperation, including joint drills. Japan has expressed security concerns about this cooperation. There is also mention of leaked Russian documents outlining potential attack plans on Japan. However, the evidence does not support the claim that China and Japan plan to invade Russia.

The evidence shows that Japan has imposed sanctions on Russia and has expressed security concerns about China's military cooperation with Russia.

The claim is not supported by the evidence. The evidence suggests military cooperation between China and Russia and strained relations between Japan and Russia.

Final Judgement

The evidence reveals military cooperation between China and Russia, and Japan's concerns about this. However, there is no evidence to support the claim that China and Japan plan to invade Russia.

The claim is demonstrably false because the provided evidence does not support the claim. Instead, the evidence suggests military cooperation between China and Russia and strained relations between Japan and Russia. `false`

Verdict: FALSE

Justification

The evidence indicates increasing military cooperation between China and Russia, with Japan expressing security concerns, as reported by Newsweek and CEPA. While there are mentions of strained relations between Japan and Russia, including leaked documents about potential attacks, there is no evidence to support the claim that China and Japan plan to invade Russia.
